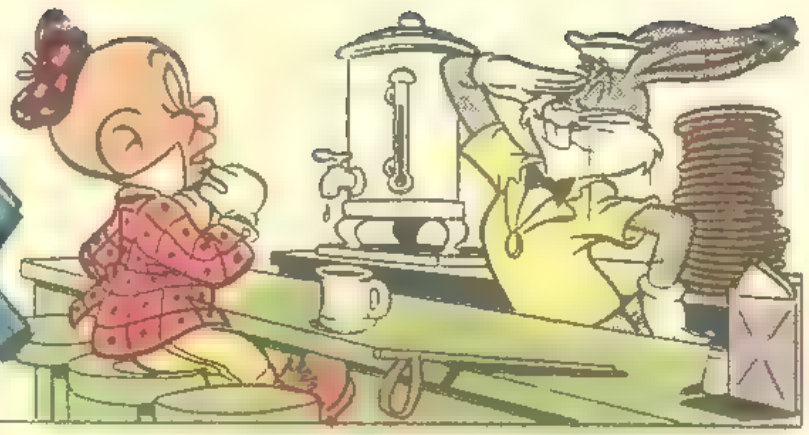
STAGE STRUCK



"It just isn't fair!" Bugs Bunny complained bitterly as he flattened another hamburger on the griddle in his steamy little diner. "I could be a great movie star too, if somebody would just give me a break!" He caught his reflection in the shiny metal of the coffee percolator and struck a pose. "Look at that high, intelligent forehead . those piercing eyes! What's Brock Rudson got that I haven't got?"

Bugs had been feeling sorry for himself for quite awhile. His great talent was being wasted, he felt, working in a diner. Other people had been discovered by the movies and gone on to fame and fortune. If Elmer Fudd could do it, why not Bugs Bunny?

He was moodily wiping off the counter when the door suddenly opened, and in breezed Elmer Fudd. It was the first time Elmer had been in the diner since he had become a famous movie director, and Bugs was a bit flustered at first.

"Coffee, Doc?" he suggested. "Or maybe a ram on high . . I mean a ham on rye!"

"Just bring me some black coffee," Elmer sighed. "You know how it is with us big movie diwectors. No time to eat."

Bugs was pouring Elmer's coffee when the idea suddenly struck him. "My chance," he exclaimed out loud, "my glorious chance to be discovered! Just watch me make a big impression on old Fuddsy! I'll start with the Army Officer bit!"

With that, Bugs marched up to the counter with Elmer's coffee, saluted smartly, fixed Elmer with a stern look, and barked, "Your coffee, Colonel! We attack at dawn!"

Elmer glanced up, puzzled, and then grinned at Bugs. "Oh sure," he chuckled. "Vewy amusing."

Pleased by such progress, Bugs acted out several more of his favorite parts as he waited on his customers, making sure that Elmer saw everything he did. At last his efforts were rewarded. Elmer beckoned to him, and, glowing with confidence, Bugs strutted back to Elmer's place at the counter. "Well?" he demanded. "What's up, Doc?"

"I've been watching you, Bunny," Elmer said confidentially. "You're wasting your time in this old diner!"

"How right you are!" Bugs cried eagerly. "I knew you had an eye for real talent! When do I start?"

"Drop in and see me at the studio," Elmer said, slapping Bugs cheerfully on the shoulder. "You'll be a gweat hit!"

Bugs turned a somersault in sheer exuberance. "I'll be the greatest thing since Rudolph Valentino! Ah, fame . . . ah, fortune! At last you've come my way!"

Elmer glanced at Bugs, a bewildered expression on his face. "Not so fast, Bunny. The job I'm offewing you is . . ."

"Say no more, Doc. I'll take it," Bugs interrupted. "What's more, you'll never regret it. I'll lay 'em in the aisles."

"Oh, no, you mustn't do that," exclaimed Elmer. "We could use some laughs with our coffee in the studio commissary, but we wouldn't want to drink it lying in the aisles."

Bugs stared at Elmer in disbelief. "You mean you only want me to be a counter boy, like I am here? Not a movie star?"

Elmer just laughed. "You? A movie star? Don't be silly, Bunny!"

Bugs shrugged his shoulders philosophically and picked up his rag. "In that case, I resign. But I can say I had the shortest acting career on record!"
